On June 5, 2004, Mother Nature unleashed her fury on Mars. Without warning, a devastating earthquake rocked the landscape, sending billions of tons of rocks hurtling into the atmosphere. To the shock of the planet, the skies went dark and volcanic eruptions were seen in the distance. In the aftermath, Mars rapidly lost its atmosphere and became an inhospitable environment to the survival of any species. Scientists were able to recover fragments of the Martian Global Surface Camera (MGS), a robotic spacecraft which was sent to the red planet to take pictures and research the planet's mysteries. One year later, Mars boasts a new civilization, but it's still a long way from reaching our high standards. Digital Transformation Sears Holdings for the first time in years is back in the black and seems to be gaining the traction it needs to drive sustainable growth again. The company's operations are much stronger and more profitable now than a year ago. At the top of the list of factors that put Sears Holdings back in a position to post profits and continue its transformation efforts are its renewed focus on increasing its digital sales. "We're in the midst of a massive, massive, migration to all digital platforms. It's going to accelerate this next year," explained senior Sears Holdings executive Edward Lampert, who headed the company before his tenure at the hedge fund ESL Investments. "The future of retail is digital, period, end of story." He noted that even though there have been fluctuations in the past, Sears had a dedicated team of about two dozen people on a daily basis focusing on growing digital sales. Sears Holdings now has about 200 people focusing on digital sales as part of the retail company, according to Lampert. "We are retooling our entire organization to respond to these digital competitors," he explained. "We've got a dedicated team that we've been working on on a daily basis. I would say they're going to be almost doubling in size in the next 12 months." Earlier this year, Sears Holdings' digital efforts included the launch of SearsNow, its e-commerce site, which enables consumers to buy merchandise online without leaving the retailer's physical stores, as well as selling and managing its branded eBay business. Lampert said digital sales grew 60% to 70% last year, on top of the year-ago increase. "We did very well in the United States and Canada," he said. "We had a very good business. We were running right there with online retailers, and we made $100 million in the third quarter. We came up short of our plan." Lampert noted that Sears Holdings' current digital revenue is about $200 million, but the retailer aims to get crossed the line. I've felt the sun. Cruel The Moon has been released. It holds a likeness to your music and my touring years. I pride myself of being down and out in your shoes, more times than others, but I know myself. I understand about time. Once you're in, you're in. There's no second-guessing time. Life's a birthday song for the latest and greatest memories. Memories, of course, are made of all those signs we'll put up in our attic. Oh, centuries of dark, emaciated faces that have spoken in this way. Cruel Moon. It's a long song. It's time, but time's not kind. You've traveled through the miles, often miles in the eyes, the frowning blonde and gray in search of whom we used to be. The Moon watches people scavenge. The Moon looks down upon the beings sent by fate to stew to this eternal life or that. Everywhere you look, you can see the progression of things. You can see the model of ways to give your soul up through all the means of exchange that allow you to hold fast to your mortality - your walking to the edge and into a new life. You're a sun-warmed, frightened dog running from little bars of light. You can see them. You see their taunting. You see their peace. You see their pride. You can see them holding their hands up when they think no one's looking. You see everything. Yes, the Moon watches and it's mercilessly cruel. Cruel Moon. Now, see, it's your time, John. I hear your footsteps coming. I meet you at the outer edge. I see you and you see me. I hear you then at the outer edge. I
